OVERVIEW

Political Science degrees are likely to include examination of past and current political conflicts; different models of government; ideologies like communism, liberalism and anarchism and concepts such as freedom, equality and human rights. As a politics undergraduate student, you’re more likely to study the work of influential historical figures in the field such as Confucius and Machiavelli and then more recent theorists such as Karl Marx and John Rawls. This degree also allows you to look at the more practical side of the field – how different political systems work, the impact of developments such as new technologies and mass media, and the role of international political organizations and alliances such as NATO and the UN.

If you studied political science, you will have gained skills useful in both public and private sectors, in roles, which are more varied than you might expect.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

One of the most obvious career path for politics graduates would be a role within the government, for example as a member of parliament (MP). MPs represent the residents of their local community in national affairs, and must first campaign to be elected, either as a member of a political party or as an individual. To succeed in this role, you should have a good knowledge of the issues affecting both of your local area and the nation as a whole. You should also be motivated, determined and a confident public speaker. Commitment is also an important factor for success as an MP; to demonstrate this, you could start by volunteering for your chosen political party.

POLITICAL ASSISTANT

Political assistants are employed by elected MPs or political candidates to carry out administrative and secretarial tasks. They also help with campaigning, research and publicity, perhaps responding to enquiries from the media or members of the public. Other tasks include assisting with campaigns before and during elections, keeping up to date with current affairs, contributing to writing reports and speeches as well as managing and collaborating with other members of the politician’s team. To become a political assistant, it’s essential to have relevant experience, such as from shadowing a political leader or taking part in an internship at a local or national government office.

GOVERNMENT SOCIAL RESEARCH OFFICER

Government research officers help to inform the policy decisions of ministers. To do this, they conduct research and evaluation activities, providing government departments and local authorities with the evidence required for the preparation, execution and assessment of policies. It’s very helpful to have studied social or public policy during your degree for entry to this role, as you’ll need a strong knowledge of social research, and good skills in this area.
CIVIL SERVICE

If you want to work within the civil service, you could choose from a variety of political jobs in government departments, agencies or non-departmental government bodies. This political career involves helping governing bodies to develop and implement policies on a daily basis. Your responsibilities will usually include contributing to policy development, answering requests for information from other government departments or members of the public, generating analysis and reports, and managing resources.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE OFFICER

This political career is ideal for those who are interested in foreign affairs, quick-thinking and skilled at solving problems. It might particularly suit graduates of international relations. As a diplomat service officer, you’d live in another country, representing the interests of your home nation and its citizens. You’d also provide advice and support to ministers developing foreign policy. To succeed in this role, you should be a good communicator, and be able to get on well with people from all societies and cultures. Bilingualism is definitely an asset.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS CONSULTANT

This role is often referred to as a “lobbyist”, but the work of public affairs consultants is more extensive than this suggests. Public affairs consultants offer valuable political and public guidance to clients using their knowledge of the political system, as well as media resources and personal contacts. They can be employed by both public and private sector organization, such as charities, governments and international bodies such as the UN. To gain entry to this political career, work experience is again essential. This could be from an internship in a political office, charity, pressure groups or public affairs consultancy, or from involvement with a political party or your university’s student union.

POLITICAL JOURNALISTS

If you’ve got a keen interest in both national and international political affairs, and want to be involved in providing in-depth news and analysis on the latest political events, this career could be good for you. You’ll also cover controversies, campaigns and debates and offer insights on possible outcomes, incentives and trends. You might work in just one field of journalism or across a combination of these, and perhaps even make a name for yourself.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND CHARITIES

If you are interested in other ways in which you can use your political science degree to make a difference (possibly on an international level). There are a huge variety of roles available within the human rights and charity sectors. Look for openings in central and local government bodies; worldwide government and non-governmental organizations. Or perhaps you’ll be involved in managing projects designed to improve conditions for different groups of people.

ALUMNI PROFILE

Name: Satinder Chera
Grad Year: 1999
Degree: BA
Program: Political Science
Title: Director of Provincial Affairs
Industry: Social Science, Education & Religion
Organization: Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses

“This was a newly-created position to enable stronger lobbying efforts on behalf of small and medium sized businesses in Ontario. The CFIB has been a big voice for small business for over 35 years with 105,000 members nationwide in every sector. Taking our direction from CFIB Members, through regular surveys, we lobby for small- and medium-sized businesses at the federal, provincial and local levels of government,” says Satinder, who is also currently in the process of completing a Master’s in Public Policy at the University of Waterloo.

“In this position, strong government relations are developed through regular meetings with the Ontario Premier, Cabinet Ministers, Deputy Ministers, Leader of the Official Opposition, Members of Provincial Parliament, Mayors and Reeves. Some of the exciting opportunities include appearing in extensively in the media. This has resulted in effective representation of business interests in major daily newspapers (including The Toronto Star, The Globe and Mail and The National Post) on live radio programs and through regional media outlets to debate public policy issues. Promoting business interests in collaboration with other trade associations has resulted in a strong public profile for small businesses.
The challenges are competing with other organizations that also have vested interests in lobbying on behalf of businesses.”

Satinder, who was an intern at The Fraser Institute in British Columbia in 1998, says relationship building with members of the government, the media and stakeholders is essential for successful lobbying.

“I was selected from hundreds of applicants to attend The Fraser Institute’s Student Leaders Colloquium in British Columbia to debate pressing public policy issues in 1997. During my internship in 1998, I reviewed government policies from the perspective of free market principles. After the internship, I understood the process of creating public policies and assessed implications of public policies,” says Satinder who co-authored a report on the performance of the government of British Columbia during the 1990s, which garnered extensive media coverage.

“My experience at The Fraser Institute, my involvement in provincial politics and my undergraduate degree were key achievements. I was initially hired at Queens Park as a policy assistant to an MPP. My undergraduate degree built a solid foundation that coupled with experiential skills to set me apart from other candidates. The key to success is to always keep a balance with work, academics and volunteering efforts. To establish a successful career in any field it is important to get involved with the community.”
