

Jessamyn Schertz (M.S., Human Language Technology and Ph.D., Linguistics, University of Arizona): is an Assistant Professor in Linguistics in the Department of Language Studies and holds a graduate appointment in the Department of Linguistics, University of Toronto. Her research focuses on how speakers and listeners integrate multiple sources of information (e.g. different aspects of the acoustic signal, social expectations) during language comprehension and production, and how use of these different dimensions varies across individuals. Other interests include processes underlying listeners' adaptation to new speakers and accents, as well as cross-language interaction in the sound systems of bilinguals and second-language learners.
